

The Antarctic Scallion

January 20, 2021 Issue # 26

"We won't ruin a good story with the facts"

Power outages traced to friendly electrician doing Tesla like experiments

The recent prolonged power outages were traced back to Dylan, one of Cohort 4's favorite members who studied advanced physics along with his electrical degree. His seemingly harmless fusion experiments patched together in a corner of the shop were enough to trigger a complete shutdown of the power grid, much like his hero, Nikola Tesla used to do to the city of Colorado Springs in 1899.

Politically toned memo warns against using political statements or clothing

A recent memo from the top brass attempted to raise the bar of hypocrisy to a new level by claiming your opinion matters but keep it to yourself. A thinly veiled addition was that subcontractors are not obligated to follow those guidelines unless they want to keep their job.

Redeployment meeting defined options as go home or go to jail

The recent mandatory meeting for redeployment made it clear that if you chose to enjoy the New Zealand countryside after arriving in Christchurch instead of taking the next flight home, you would be reported to immigration as a terrorist and could plan to spend the rest of your free time on the run. Other issues addressed included the warm reminder that the program would not reimburse any Covid testing that might be required by your home country. But when the CDC announced an hour later that all travelers to the US would require a negative test within 72 hours of boarding an international flight, HR miraculously had a change of heart and pledged to support all workers like close family members.

New flossing campaign in the dental suite results in a run on floss in the McM store

As signatures on the weekly sign-up sheet for dental cleanings reached a fever pitch, respondents realized that their pathetic flossing habits would no longer be tolerated by Bob and Marisa once they gazed upon the new ceiling poster. As a result, floss sales at the store have been up 750% in the last week, resulting in a handsome commission for the hard working duo that should easily cover a first class upgrade for the trip home.