

The Antarctic Scallion

January 30, 2021 Special SPO Issue # 28
"We won't ruin a good story with the facts"

South Pole butter connoisseur offered lucrative contract with Land O'Lakes

Sean the South Pole carpenter, also known as Butterman, came down to the Ice with 40 kilos of New Zealand salted butter to satisfy his taste for slabs of fat on everything he consumes. His boundless taste may finally be paying off since MN based Land O'Lakes recently extended a six figure offer to have him be a spokesman for their products, a number only exceeded by his cholesterol and triglycerides.

Outdoor Pickleball proves to be a hard sell

Despite many polies claiming to enjoy outdoor recreation in their spare time, efforts to get folks to show up for pickleball has proven to be tougher than anticipated. Bob the dentist found himself repeatedly alone on the court next to the South Pole marker despite advertising on the scroll and by the stairs for two weeks running.

Ukulele sextet goes viral after SPO lounge performance

Like a scene from the movie O Brother Where Art Thou six ukulele masters rocked the B1 lounge at South Pole recently, only to find out their song went viral a few hours later. Capital Records fruitlessly tried to contact the group to sign a contract, but spotty satellite coverage resulted in the record conglomerate giving up and going with a "Freebird" remake from a Lynyrd Skynyrd tribute band.

Meteorology wizard adds home brewed ingredients to add to party flavors

Clint the local weatherman has come up with a proprietary method of extracting unusual ingredients from the clouds that hover over the polar plateau. The rich, brown syrupy liquid that he shows up with in an Erlenmeyer flask and carefully dispenses in drinks of partying polies was recently tested by the astrophysics folks. It demonstrated chemistry from outside our galaxy, and could only be compared to formulas of THC in the 20% range.