

The Antarctic Scallion

February 2, 2021 Special SPO Issue # 29
"We won't ruin a good story with the facts"

Head weighing bucket content resembles wastewater effluent

It was all fun and games at the head weighing contest until chief dunker Finn noticed the layer of scum and particulate matter in the bucket following the macro-cephalic dip by Joey, the eventual winner. Medical was put on alert and all contestants were notified by email of easy access to antibiotics for possible eye, ear and sinus infections as a result of the exposure to the re-useable bucket, which was quickly and quietly whisked away by the haz waste team.

Roomba vacuum caught stalking polies

Video surveillance footage confirmed the innocent looking vacuums that roam the hall of the South Pole station were programmed by IT to stalk and record folks deemed unstable by NSF standards.

Pastry chef attracts the attention of the Vatican

The extraordinary pastries coming out of the South Pole galley have been labeled as sinful because of their presentation and flavor. A photo of Jen's artistic and tasteful creations somehow made it to the Holy See and was immediately escalated to Pope Francis where he had to be convinced that it was not the work of the devil, but only a humble and talented pastry chef at the South Pole.

Departments combine to counteract Hannah's glowing, contagious aura

The Safety and HR departments have combined in an attempt to dampen the tremendous aura emitted from Hannah, the exuberant assistant station manager. Known for their ability to reduce or eliminate the pleasure that often accompanies tasks that they deem to be risky, a committee of members from both departments determined that their combined negative energy might be enough to keep Hannah's overwhelming spirit from spreading to other parts of the station, and avoid the feared "excessive happiness" syndrome coined in the movie Patch Adams which starred Robin Williams.